Louisville, the case cannot be taken to the United States supreme court. The railroad has no track in the state and it has always taken the position that the assessment of its intangible property should be nominal. The decision of the state supreme court, it is predicted, will drive the company out of Kentucky.

BIGGY

resignation as chief, in Kell's hands. Before leaving for Belvedere, Chief Biggy prepared the resignation in his own handwriting. It set forth the reasons for his quitting the department, and contained a denial of any charges of neglect of duty.

The chief told Kell that he feared both the police commission and Mayor Edward P. Taylor were being embarrassed by the frequency and bitterness of the attacks upon his administration of the police department, and that, to save his friends, he was willing to sacrifice himself.

Kell assured Biggy that the police commission was satisfied with his administration, and advised him not to withdraw under fire. Kell argued with Biggy for an hour and a half, and refused to allow him to depart for San Francisco in his Jesponden condition. After awhile Biggy appeared to regain his usual cheerful mood, and departed on the journey which ended so tragically.

In the face of indications of the conflict raging in the chief's mind, and in spite of his interview with Biggy, Kell will not as yet say that he believed the chief was accidentally drowned, but intimated the plausibility of suicide.

The resignation of the chief was given to Mayor Taylor by Kell. It sets forth in detail the motives that inspired him in the administration of his office, defends the probity of his acts, and scores his critics for their injustice.

The attacks upon his character and criticism of his administration of the police department preyed upon the mind of Chief Biggy on the occasion preceding his disappearance according to Congressman Julius Kahn, who leaves for Washington today.

Kahn said that he met Biggy on Monday afternoon near police headquarters and had a few minutes conversation with the chief. The first remark of Biggy was a question as to whether Kahn had seen the newspaper "roasts" about him.

"He then spoke of being persecuted by newspaper in this city," continued Kahn, "and said that he was subjected to the annoyance because he refused to do politics with their favorites."

"Biggy said, 'It will come out all right, however, finally. This business can't last forever and I will eventually be vindicated. They put me in office and then thought that I would do just as they dictated.'

"This is a long story and it would take some time to explain the matter in its entirety," he continued, "but come to see me when you return from Washington and I will be ready to tell you everything."

"We parted at the corner and that is the last I saw of the chief."

Driven Wild.

San Francisco, Dec. 2.—Following an exposition of the insufficient reasons given by the police commission for the strange disappearance and probable suicide of Chief of Police William J. Biggy, who was lost from the patrol boat on the bay Monday night, the Daily News this afternoon says:

"There has been a big effort on the part of Biggy's friends and the members of the police commission to deny the stories of the chief's escapades prior to his disappearance. The public is entitled to know the truth.

"Biggy had been drinking heavily for several weeks prior to his death. On numerous occasions he became mixed in night orgies, which became known all over town. He imagined that every man he saw on the streets after dark was a hold-up man, and on numerous occasions, on going home in his automobile, after a night of drinking in down-town saloons, he would halt his machine, roughly stop innocent pedestrians, and threaten them with arrest on the suspicion that were footpads.

"He was given to making spectacular raids single-handed, and at times the peculiar things that he did could be attributed only to drink. Commissioner Leggett was compelled on many occasions to go to the chief's office and remain there with him. On these occasions Biggy would promise to mend his ways and quit doing foolish things, but as soon as he began drinking again he would break out anew.

"Biggy was never accused of being dishonest, so far as money was concerned. He appeared to his friends to be trying in the main to do what was right, but he did not seem to accomplish much."

REFUTES
GALLAGHER
TESTIMONY

San Francisco, Dec. 2.—Thomas Burns, cashier of the mint, was the principal witness today in the trial of Abraham Ruef, charged with attempting to bribe supervisor J. J. Furey. Burns' testimony contradicted that of Ruef's former go-between, James J. Gallagher, in reference to the amount of money Gallagher said he had in his possession to give to the supervisors.

Gallagher previously testified that he had eight thousand to ten thousand in bills in a safe deposit box. This box was shown to have a capacity of 618 cubic inches and that 5000 bills filled 650 cubic inches. Attorney Ach. for Ruef, showed from this that Gallagher had made a misstatement of the number of bills he held for the supervisors.
