BASKETRY
IN ALASKA

The best baskets are made in Alaska's interior. In the winter, the women sit by fires and make baskets out of berries. The berries are cooked and then pounded into juice, which is used to make the baskets. The women then weave the baskets by hand, using the juice to strengthen the fibers. The baskets are used for storage and transportation of goods. The women also use baskets for fishing and hunting.

THE BASKETRY OF THE INDIANS

The Inuit people of Alaska are well-known for their skill in making baskets. They use a variety of natural materials, such as plant fibers and animal hides, to create baskets that are both functional and culturally significant. The baskets are used for storage, transportation, and even as a form of communication. The Inuit also use baskets in their ceremonies and rituals.

THE BASKETRY OF THE NORTHERN INDIANS

The northern Indians of Alaska are also skilled in making baskets. They use a variety of materials, such as willow and hazel, to create baskets that are used for storage, transportation, and even as a form of communication. The baskets are also used in their ceremonies and rituals. The northern Indians also use baskets in their daily lives, such as for carrying fishing gear or hunting supplies.
