

MRS. CARTER TO BE HERE WEDNESDAY

They don't often come back, but Mrs. Leslie Carter came back all the way from New York, where she has been away, off the stage, for several years. Her return furnished the opportunity for the return of our flame-haired beauty to the stage, and she has an opportunity with two of the necessary "big" scenes on her admirers were long wont to be blazed out again as her "Titan" tresses, in the emphatic successes of her "Two Women" at the Grand theater.

This is the way the critic of the New York Press began his review of Mrs. Leslie Carter in "Two Women" a play by Rupert Hughes, which she has been performing for several months at the Grand theater, New York, last season. Mrs. Carter will be seen in "Two Women" at the Grand theater, in five acts, the leading part of Jeannette Moreau in the stages of consumption, struggling bravely in poverty with her husband, an impoverished but earnest accountant, who has gone the way of all flesh, and as the young man's inheritance brings him fortune, his faithful wife falls deeply in love with him.

Mrs. Carter, a dancer on the stage, comes across the living picture of Jeannette, a dancer on the stage about whom a play has been written, because of her resemblance to his dead wife. This woman, Jeannette Moreau, who poses for the undying portrait of the dead Jeannette, is the heroine of the piece. One can hardly think that a woman would reform, yet the transformation occurs when, under the influence of Jeannette's memory, in the handsome and steadfast painter's cottage at Antoull, the woman is animated with an honest love for him and a desire to let her better self conquer. In a transport of deep feeling and sincerity, she proclaims her love for this man and begs him to lift her up. He refuses.

It is with bitter heart-burning and hatred for "the cruelty of good people," that she receives the attention of a former admirer, the Marquis Pascal de Foudras; but she drives the marquis off about his business, turning him away after a bold avowal of her love for Remy, who has found he cannot do without Jeannette, and has taken her to his arms and called her "wife." The infuriated Marquis returns and denounces Jeannette to Remy and receives a blow for his trouble, whereupon a duel is arranged.

Believing he has been duped, Remy denounces the woman. Here she bursts into a torrent of protests and indignation, asserting her wrong and castigating him, for his lack of faith in her.

Both in this scene and in the preceding one, Mrs. Carter is said to give a strong taste of that old emotional power wherewith she swayed so many audiences in the old days, like a true mistress of tragedy.

In "Two Women," Mrs. Carter has from all accounts come back into her own. Her victory in this play is such a one as is seldom gained by any artist, and she has here recovered the old mysterious spell that only Mrs. Carter, among actresses of the present day, can work on the hearts of her hearers.

The appreciation of her success is unmistakably sincere and enthusiastic. Many curtain calls have marked the performance of "Two Women" wherever presented, and have brought out Mrs. Carter to bow in grateful response to the plaudits.

Mrs. Carter is seldom off the stage; in fact, it may be said, that she dominates every scene. There are scenes in which, by the sheer force of her magnetism and the energy of her impersonation, she lifts the play higher than otherwise it could go. At the end, when Remy is blinded from the duel he has fought with his blackguardly rival, and when Jeannette tells him she will stay with him always, the scene is full of pathos. Able assistance has been given to the triumphant star by her manager, John Cort, in one of the very best supporting companies this actress has ever had. The production alone is one of the most magnificent ever seen, and is to be compared with "Du Barry," in which she starred so successfully. "Two Women" is declared to be a welcome contribution to the serious drama of the time, in a season devoted mostly to frivolity. That it is so welcome is due in great measure to Mrs. Carter, whose success in this play has been such a distinct pleasure to her army of admirers.

GRANGERS RESOLVE AGAINST IT

Whereas our declaration of purposes declare that it is best for us to avoid the credit system, the mortgage system and every other system tending to prodigality and bankruptcy, and

Whereas, many of us know by personal experience that much debt is a condition to be assumed only as an absolute necessity to overcome an emergency, and

Whereas, there appears to be an effort to extend the bondage already existing in many places to all places for what we believe can be done as well or better on a cash basis without overtaxing our citizens, and

Whereas, certain parties are trying to foist upon us a road bonding scheme principally for pleasure going by non-taxpayers to the injury of citizen taxpayers, and

Whereas, it is our conviction that all road improvement should begin at each shipping point and continue out into the rural communities equally in each county, that business may be facilitated and encouraged without discrimination, and

Whereas, some county commission courts have already blazed the way how this may be done, honestly, economically and efficiently without perpetual bondage to their citizens and succeeding generations, and

Whereas, with an economical and efficient management by our county commissioners courts and the employment of convicts, we can pay for all the good roads we are able to build each year without much, if any, increase in taxation,

Therefore, be it resolved by Spring Valley Grange No. 464 that we are opposed to being bonded for any purpose except for calamity by fire or flood or pestilence or foreign invasion.

Unanimously adopted, Feb. 17th, 1912.

HALF A LOAF may be "better than no bread", as the proverb goes, but half a loaf of our bread is only an aggravation. For it is so light and toothsome, so "moorish" in flavor, that even a whole loaf goes a very short way in satisfying the wants of those who try it. If you would know what perfect bread is, try some of ours.
