Anton saw him coming and rose to the occasion. He had always wanted the renewal of their broken friendship to shoot a wild turkey, but he had was one of the things Katrina meant, never seen one, and here was his opportunity. The Roch family would feast upon wild turkey on Thanksgiving day.

He fired the last charge in his gun and missed. A bunch of bronze tall feathers fluttered into the air and down again. Then the indignant turkey charged him furiously. Anton Roch was small and thin and wiry, and the turkey only administered one vicious nip at his leg before Mr. Roch had wormed himself into the shadow of the spruce tree, which stood like a desert island in the midst of its leafless, high limbed companions. As he settled himself comfortably he nearly fell off his perch on to the ground. His gun clattered downward. Staring at him across another branch was the rubicund visage of his neighbor, Hans Trinkel.

"Himmel!" they muttered in unison. Anton was the first to recover himself, "So." He lifted Inquiring brows. eh? For what?"

Unusual Feature of Thanksgiving Celebration In New York.

In some ways the celebration of Thanksgiving in the metropolis is similar to that in other parts of the country. For example, the New Yorker stuffs himself with turkey and other things and feels only thankful because he is full. In one aspect, however, Gotham's observance of the day is distinctive. This is the ragamuffin purade of the children. Dressing themselves up in rags or in outlandish costumes, the little folks start out begging pennies, ringing doorbells, hitting passersby with stockings filled with flour and parading through the streets
