The Markets

LOCAL MARKETS.

The hop market shows some life again, but prices are not bettered since the quiet spell. Buyers are willing to talk business at lower prices and the growers seem willing to meet them. One sale of 400 bales is reported, it being the lot of Julius Wolf, of Silverton, 3000 bales of which sold at 15c and the balance at 14 cents. There is little doing in the way of contracts, and local dealers have few orders of this kind. In the yards everyone is busy setting poles and getting ready for the 1914 crop. The wheat market is practically dead. Prices are quoted but this is merely a matter of form, as there are no sales, no offerings and no bidders. The price might as well remain on the boards until stereotyped. The market is abundantly supplied with vegetables. Potato shipments are good, most bills going to California, though some are for Arizona. The production of cheese is increasing and prices getting down to the summer figures. Eggs are plentiful and the prices range from 18 to 19 cents. The condition of the wheat crop the world over is above the average.

Portland Livestock Report.

Receipts for the week have been: Cattle, 1736; calves, 26; hogs, 2246; sheep, 2749.

Cattle.

Cattle receipts fairly heavy this week; market steady. Bulk light steers sold $7.75 to $8, with a few graded and baby beef varieties $8 to $8.25. Heavy bullocks $7.50 to $7.75. Strong demand for deboned heifers and cows.

Hogs.

Hog market heavy to a shade weaker during the first half of the week, but partially recovered toward the close. Bulk of best light hogs sold from $8.50 to $8.65, with a few loads at $8.70. A good supply of stock hogs at country points, but feed is scarce and growers are not getting their holdings ready for market as easy as usual.

Sheep.

Sheep house receipts light. Lambs sold up to $8.75. Best wool wethers $5.75 to $6 featured, but few were sales were made. Mutton feeling was just steady with little change, and absence of select quality prevented a satisfactory gauge of the market.

MISUNDERSTOOD MORAL

NO MEXICAN ACTOR WANTS TO TAKE PART OF CHRIST IN BASTER PASSION PLAY.

Mexico City, April 24.—Three Mexicans were hanging upon crosses, tied with ropes, in a small interior town, at Easter time, two years ago. It was the annual passion play of the village and the citizens were gathered around the crosses, lamenting over the dying Christ, who was crucified by the man on the middle cross and cursing, in real round oaths, the two thieves who were hung on either side.

The Mexicans, in the story of the two thieves, do not understand the moral of Christ offering redemption to the outcast pair at the last moment; instead, they believe that the thieves were placed beside Christ to make his death the more ignominious. And so, in all village passion plays, the thieves come in for a vast amount of execration.

In this particular instance the crowd, in its hatred of the thieves, got into a white-hot revival beat against the thieves, and one Mexican, a little drunker than the rest, suddenly shouted:

"Rateros, rateros," meaning "thieves, thieves," and dashed out from the crowd with a stick which he jabbed into the ribs of the innocent actor on the cross.

"Let me alone," shouted the tied-up actor. "I am only acting. I am Juan Lopez and you know me well." His voice could not be heard above the clamor. The excited crowd only cheered on the man with the stick, who gave the actor another thrust. The other thief began to shout for the police and the actor impersonating Christ joined in the declaration of the now injured "chief" that they were only acting.

After another thrust or two the "thief" fainting, and when the crowd saw that he really had been injured they quieted down enough so that the voice of the actor impersonating the Christ could be heard:

"Fools!" he shouted. "You have killed him. Let me down. I will not be the Christ any longer."

He was untied and the first thing he did when he got to the ground was to give a sound beating to the man with the stick. In the meantime, the unconscious actor was taken down from the cross and removed to the village doctor's office. Two weeks in bed was the penalty he paid for his realistic acting.

There hasn't been an Easter passion play in this village for the past two years, for the simple reason that no one is willing to take the part of the thief.

While Prince Boris' deputation was waiting for the return of Professor Marxman's embassy the Princess Wilhelmina was unconsciously showing a marked preference for Prince Paul. Boris saw it and upbraided his cousin, accusing him of attempting to win her heart. Paul, who considered any such attempt dishonorable, forthwith treated the princess with marked coolness. He could not have chosen a better way to win her for himself. Wilhelmina, piqued, resolved that she would bring to her feet this man who spurned her.

A ROYAL MARRIAGE

How a Prince Went Incognito For His Bride

By JOHN Y. LARNED

Many years ago, before the modern methods of transubstantiation came into vogue, the Crown Prince Boris of Barataria became betrothed to Wilhelmina of Altruria. Soon after the betrothal it was arranged that the princess should come to Barataria to be married, a deputation being sent to her father's capital to bring her. Now, it occurred to Prince Boris that he would like to go with the deputation incognito and observe the princess.

Prince Boris had a cousin, Prince Paul. Paul was an orphan and had been brought up by his uncle, King Carl, side by side with Boris. Paul, though a manly fellow, was very amiable; Boris, arrogant and dictatorial.

Boris, having determined to accompany the deputation, fixed upon Paul to represent him, in bringing the princess to Barataria.

The cousins started at the head of a retinue every portion of which was pledged to keep the secret. When they approached the capital of Altruria, Paul rode ahead of the others as the crown prince's representative, the crown prince himself taking position among the hindmost.

On reaching the capital the deputation were given apartments in the palace, and when they had been refreshed, headed by Prince Paul, they were led to an audience chamber, where they were received by the royal family, including the Princess Wilhelmina.

There Paul presented his credentials. While he was reading the paper the princess was watching him, and, though she concealed her feelings, a wish was born in her that the crown prince's representative might be the prince himself. Paul had about him a quiet dignity mixed with modesty. He was well formed, handsome, and his voice was melodious. The truth is that the princess fell in love with him at sight. As for Prince Paul, his eyes were on the paper he was reading. At the end of his address he said that he was ready to escort the bride to his master's capital whenever she was ready to set forth.

When the princess heard these last words she resolved that she would not be in any hurry to depart. Having never seen the man she was to marry, she naturally shrank from going to him. She did not realize that the spark of love for his representative kindled in her heart was a great danger and liable to breed trouble. She was very young and not inclined to prudence. A pet of her father, King Ludwig, she had great influence over him, but in matters of state, one of which was the choice of a husband, she knew that she would not be permitted to exercise her own sweet will.

Yet the princess was no fool. Desiring to delay her departure for Barataria, she told her father that she wished certain guarantees that had not been mentioned in the marriage contract and asked him to send an embassy to the court of Barataria to demand them. This, of course, would keep Prince Paul and his suit in Altruria till the matter was adjusted. King Ludwig objected, but since his daughter's demands were not important and sure to be granted yielded to her request. The princess' education had been in the care of an old professor, Marxman, to whom she was devoted and who was devoted to her. He had been at one time a member of the king's cabinet and was a shrewd diplomat. Wilhelmina insisted that he be made chief of the embassy, and she asked him to keep an eye open in her interest with a view to discovering if there was any reason why her marriage with Prince Boris would be unfortunate either for her country or for her.

While Prince Boris' deputation was waiting for the return of Professor Marxman's embassy the Princess Wilhelmina was unconsciously showing a marked preference for Prince Paul. Boris saw it and upbraided his cousin, accusing him of attempting to win her heart. Paul, who considered any such attempt dishonorable, forthwith treated the princess with marked coolness. He could not have chosen a better way to win her for himself. Wilhelmina, piqued, resolved that she would bring to her feet this man who spurned her.

The embassy to Barataria was absent much longer than had been expected. The princess was not sorry. Being in love, marriage with a man she had never seen was repulsive to her, and a hope sprang within her that her tutor would discover some reason prejudicial to the interests of Altruria why her union with Prince Boris should not take place.

Meanwhile the crown prince was attempting to force himself on the notice of his betrothed, but to his chagrin she gave every evidence that he was distasteful to her. He abused Paul, who, his position being a burden to him, asked to be relieved and sent back to Barataria. His request was granted only too willingly, but when he announced his withdrawal Wilhelmina persuaded her father to state that such an act would be considered an insult and unless he remained to carry out the purpose for which he had been sent the betrothal would be annulled.

There was nothing for Prince Boris to do but order his cousin to await the return of the embassy from Barataria. It arrived soon after the proposed departure of Prince Paul and Professor Marxman reported directly to the king, with whom he was closeted for a long period. The Princess Wilhelmina was called into the conference. When she came out her face was aglow with a happy excitement.

It was known that the additional guarantees asked for had been granted by the king of Barataria, but no move was made for the departure of the princess. Another embassy was dispatched to King Carl, but its object was a secret. During its absence the people of Altruria noticed important movements of troops to the frontier. As soon as the embassy returned military supplies were hurried in large quantities to depots near the border.

One morning when Prince Boris was about to leave his apartment he found a sentry at his door. He inveighed against the indignity, but it availed nothing. All the suit except Prince Paul found themselves in a like position. Paul received a command to wait upon the king in his cabinet. On his arrival the king addressed him:

"I have some information with reference to your majesty—

"Majesty?"

"Yes, majesty. My former minister, Professor Marxman, on his first visit to Barataria unearthed a conspiracy which took place when you were an infant. Your father was king of Barataria and died shortly before you were born, your mother dying at your birth. Your uncle concealed the fact that your father had left an heir and brought you up as the son of a younger brother.

"Recent acts of the usurper, Carl, have led me to prefer that the rightful heir should wield the scepter of Barataria. I have revealed the conspiracy that made your uncle king. The people of Barataria have risen and deposed Carl, and they have proclaimed you their sovereign. I am prepared to support your claims with troops, but so unimportant is the desire of your people to have you for their king that no support is needed."

Paul stood thunderstruck.

"How was all this discovered?" he asked as soon as he regained speech.

"When Marxman went to Barataria he secretly sought information concerning the affairs of the kingdom. Certain of the conspirators who had helped to place your uncle on the throne and had of late received as much preference as they coveted gave Marxman a clue by which he learned the whole plot."

It was some time before Paul could be convinced that he should return to Barataria as king. He was decided by the arrival of a deputation of the nobles of Barataria, who knelt before him as their sovereign and begged him to return and assume the reins of government, representing that if he refused anarchy would ensue. Before he set out on his journey King Ludwig asked for his wishes concerning the embassy he had headed.

"Free them and assure my cousin that I have had nothing to do with this great change."

"Are there any other matters on which you wish to consult me before your departure?"

"I wish only to say that I sincerely trust that the two kingdoms we rule shall be always friendly."

"The best way to do that," replied Ludwig, "is by marriage. I offer you the hand of my oldest daughter, Hildegard, the princess royal."

The prince paused before replying. "If I am to be allied to your family I see no better way than to carry out the contract made between my cousin and the Princess Wilhelmina."

"If you are satisfied, be it so."

The young king went straight to Wilhelmina from her father's cabinet. She congratulated him on justice having been done him with downcast eyes.

"Your father," he said, "has made me happy by transferring to me the contract made with my cousin."

"Perhaps," she faltered, still looking on the floor, "you would prefer another."

"Your father offered me the princess royal. I told him that I would prefer a simple princess."

She raised her eyes to his, and they sprung into each other's arms.
