DRAMATIC STORY

Figaro" was leading against me. We attached no importance to them. "Le Figaro's" campaign was particularly grave since Editor Calmette signed his articles. He tried to purchase witnesses against me. I, too, might have indulged in such politics, since I was offered documents against Calmette, but I refused them, for I would not stoop to take up such arms against my opponent.

The two letters the publication of which his wife so feared, the witness explained, were written to her by himself before their marriage. They were very personal. One was written on "General Council of the Sarthe" letterheads and was short. The second was on "Chamber of Deputies" letterheads and covered 16 pages.

Letter "Bared His Soul"

This letter bared his soul, the witness said, revealing his innermost thoughts for years back. In it he explained the reasons, principally political, which kept him from divorcing his first wife at the time the letter was written.

His warning that these letters were to be published, Caillaux testified, came from ex-Premier Louis Barthou, who told Mrs. Caillaux that he had seen and talked with her husband's first wife under a street lamp and that she had read him certain "private and intimate communications."

In spite of numerous warnings, however, the witness said he was astonished when the "Ton Jo" letter appeared. His astonishment turned to violent rage when he was informed by one whose word he could not doubt that the other two letters were also to be published.

The Princess De Mesagne-Estradero, he related, told Mme. Caillaux that Calmette had made an offer of 30,000 francs to use one of her friends to arrange a meeting between himself and Caillaux's first wife. The princess said she received an offer of an even larger sum, but refused the commission.

"Why did they wish to print those letters?" exclaimed the witness passionately. "To humiliate me, if possible, by dragging my most private sentiments before the public.

"I might have borne it but the very idea struck to the quick my wife's most sacred feelings and wounded her pride as a wife and mother.

His Wife Is Crazy.

"Suffering, harassed, her nerves shattered, my wife came to the day of the shooting. Each day had seen her more and more highly strung, the frightful state of her nerves impairing still further her general health, which is not of the best.

"About 9 o'clock one morning she came into my room while I was finishing dressing. She held that day's copy of "Le Figaro." On the front page was an article headed:

"Comic Interlude—Ton Jo!"

"The next thing you will see," she cried, "will be my own pet name paraded in the same place!"

"She threw the paper violently into a chair. "Can't you do something to stop this?" she asked.

"We decided to consult Judge Monier. My proposal was to see him about 1:30 that afternoon. Forgetting that the judge is detained at the palace of justice at that hour. So I left for the cabinet meeting. In this way it was my wife who finally talked with the judge."

Monier having given it as his opinion that nothing was to be gained and that something might be lost by legal proceedings, Mme. Caillaux reported to her husband, asking him:

"What do you propose doing?"

He said it in French.

"If that's the way things stand," I replied, "testified the witness, "I'll smash his face!"

The expression, as was brought out by Maitre Lascot, Mme. Caillaux's lawyer, "casser la gueule," might have been taken to be literal or to be a threat to kill. It does not translate quite accurately into English, in which its best equivalent would be: "If that's the way things stand, I'll just hand him something myself."

"My wife had called on me at the ministry," went on Caillaux. "On our way home in our automobile my wife evidently was pondering my threat.

"When do you think of doing what you said?" she asked. "Today!"

"No," said I, "not today. I shall do it at my own day and hour, but soon."

"As I left the house after lunch my wife told me she had decided not to dine, as we had intended, at the Italian

ARGUMENTS AGAINST MEASURES ARE FILED

Arguments opposing numerous measures to be voted upon at the coming election were received by Secretary of State Olcott today. This is the last day for filing negative arguments and none will be received after five o'clock this afternoon. F. W. Mulkey filed arguments opposing the $1500 tax exemption and the graduated sur tax amendment. The People's Power League opposes the legislative amendment providing for a lieutenant governor, the amendment providing for the classification of property for taxation, measures designed to end single tax agitation and the bill providing for a supplementary primary.

W. T. Foster, president of Reed College, and others filed arguments against the dental bill, fathered by Painless Parker. The Non-Partisan League offered arguments against the universal eight-hour law, eight-hour law for women, $1500 tax exemption, graduated surtax amendment, amendment to abolish state senate, amendment providing proportional representation and amendment creating department of public works.

the estate of a Frenchman who died in Brazil some sixty years ago, leaving an enormous fortune, which has never been distributed among the heirs owing to complications with French government. His enemies charged that Caillaux proposed to settle this case on the basis of about 20 per cent for the heirs and the balance for his party's campaign fund.

All His Ammunition.

Later, Latzarus continued, Calmette showed him two papers relative to the incident of the sending of a German warship to Agadir in northwest Africa, in disregard of French claims to authority there—papers, according to the witness, which would have been of grave import for Caillaux. Calmette told Latzarus, however, that he would not use them, as they might make trouble for France outside the country.

When "Le Figaro" published the "Ton Jo" letter, the editor told him, Latzarus said, that if it failed to accomplish its purpose against Caillaux he would have to give up his campaign, as he had no more ammunition.

This was in contradiction of Mme. Caillaux claim that the editor had two more of her letters, which she was even more anxious to have suppressed than the "Ton Jo" communication.

At this point, said Latzarus, someone reminded Calmette of the "Fabre document," a memorandum by Judge Fabre, charging that Caillaux brought pressure to bear on him to postpone the execution of the millionaire swindler, Rochette, who, as a result of the delay, escaped entirely.

"Oh, but I promised not to use that," Latzarus testified that Calmette answered.

Then, taking out his wallet, Latzarus said, Calmette showed the "Fabre document," saying, "I will not part from this, ever."

"If he had had any other letters," concluded the witness, "we would have found them after his death, but we found nothing."

During her examination Mme. Caillaux asserted that while she sat in the waiting room in the office of "Le Figaro," three men were talking near her, that they mentioned her name, that one of them spoke of a publication concerning her soon to appear in the paper and that this was another thing which tended to deprive her of her reason, from anger and excitement, as she entered Calmette's room.

Say She's Mistaken.

One of these men, a business office attaché of the paper, named Voisin, followed Latzarus on the witness stand. He and his two companions, he said, were discussing pictures. One of the men, Honoré, and the other one, acquaintance named Mason, unconnected with "Le Figaro," Voisin denied that Mme. Caillaux's name was mentioned.

Two office boys named Pottier and Rouleau testified in corroboration of the stories told by Nicet and Girac, the attendants in the waiting room.

Next a deposition by President Poincaré was read. This incident of bringing a French chief executive into a criminal trial as a witness, even though he did not appear in person, was something absolutely unprecedented in the history of the Gallic courts and it was only by considerable stretching of two articles of a law promulgated by King Louis Philippe in 1832 that it was managed at all.

This law prohibits the calling of princes and princesses of the royal blood, high dignitaries or the minister or justice as witnesses in legal proceedings. It does, however, permit their testimony, specially authorized, to be introduced in writing, as was done today.

The president's deposition was as follows:

President Poincaré a Witness.

"On Monday morning of the day Calmette was killed, a cabinet meeting was called at the Elysee. As usual the president talked with the various members of the cabinet before entering upon official business. He talked for some time not only with Premier Doumergue, but with Minister of Finance Joseph Caillaux as well. Later, as the cabinet members were filing into the room where such meetings are usually held, Caillaux stopped the president and said:

"Mr. President, may I speak with you for a moment privately?"

The president acquiesced and the doors closed, leaving the two men alone. Rapidly but in a voice filled with emotion, Caillaux then told of his fears.

"I have it from the best source," he said, "that letters written by me to the lady who is now my wife have been given to "Le Figaro" and that Gaston Calmette, the editor, intends using them. I know that he will publish them."

"You must be mistaken," the president replied. "I know Calmette. He is a gallant man. He would never bring the name of a woman into an affair of politics."

"Caillaux was insistent. The people who had told him of Calmette's intentions could not be mistaken. And, too, he had visible indications that "Le Figaro" was preparing for further publications. That very morning "Le
