OUR NICE LITTLE LIES

Katherine Pope writes an interesting essay on the advantages of deceit, or the use of tact, the introduction of which is:

"Men, whether deservedly or not, are accounted more truthful, less given to deceiving ways, than women. I sometimes wonder if their women intimates never tell them that not infrequently this lauded honesty of theirs looks to the less blunt sex most undesirable, not to say grossly stupid, grossly brutal."

The common confusion of lying with tact may easily be carried too far. There may be some tact in some lying, but there is no lying in true tact. The highest tact is in absolute truthfulness.

There are little lies that seem justifiable. You see an ill friend who looks worse and tell him he looks better. It makes him feel better. Maybe he actually becomes better as a result. It is a lie that does nobody harm and does some good.

But there are few lies that have so good a motive. If we told no lies except to help other people, this would be a strangely truthful world.

We pay compliments to please others, but the ulterior motive is to ingratiate ourselves into their affections. We make ourselves agreeable by feigning feelings and opinions that we do not really possess. We try to make ourselves liked not for what we really are but for what we only pretend to be.

No, it would be far better tact, and far easier, to be than it is to pretend to be.

By pretense we go a long way around to reach a point that by sincerity we might reach by a direct route.

A NEW NEIGHBORHOOD STANDARD

New methods of locomotion have in the past always brought about great industrial, social, even national changes, says one of our farm exchanges. When the sailing vessel superseded the caravan it spelled the doom of Turkey, Arabia, and Persia. Steam drove sails off the ocean and gave England and Germany a world trade for which they are now battling. The railroads opened America and knit firmly together a nation made up of parts separated by deserts, mountains, great rivers and savage tribes. The telegraph, the cable, electric traction have built our cities and stimulated our commerce.

Will the auto-truck and electric railway do for the country what the street car and auto-truck have already done for the city? It seems probable. A man living twenty miles from town is no farther away by auto-truck than the man living three miles away is by four-horse team. Its coming will enlarge the neighborhood, weaken the small roadside villages, make strong trading centers of more progressive country towns, and these, linked by electric traction services, will have a solidarity of interest now unknown.

This is not all prophecy. It is happening in the east. It is bound to happen here in the northwest. These changes are sure to bring about many re-adjustments, not only in our business life, but in our social, and educational life as well.

The constitutional convention of New York has voted down the proposition for a single-chambered legislature. The Empire state isn't going to depart in that matter from the ideal of a representative body which the forefathers adhered to. Oregon is not so hide-bound in the matter of tradition and about next year the people will vote the upper branch of its legislative body out of business forever.

The Wall Street Journal remarks, "When the editor of the Berlin Lokal Anzeiger points out that Germany herself at the Hague conference caused the rejection of the proposal to prohibit the supply of war-material to belligerents by neutral countries, it looks as if there is another country subject to certain internal troubles."

Harry Thaw is sane. So was the last jury that tried him.

The Liberty bell was in Salem today and it was greeted with glad acclaim. It afforded an opportunity to renew one's patriotic fealty to American principles of government and popular liberty, and thousands of people took advantage of the occasion. The old bell proclaimed the freedom of this country and the formation of a government "of the people, by the people, for the people." That was over a century ago but the spirit which caused its tones to ring over the republic just struggling into existence is as strong as ever. American thought and ideals and new world institutions come nearer dominating the world than ever before. When old Andrew McNair rang the bell to chronicle the signing of the Declaration of Independence on that fateful Fourth of July its tones were heard around the earth, and they are echoing still in every truly loyal heart.

"The old state house bell is silent,
Hushed now its clamorous tongue,
But the spirit it awakened
Still is living—ever young!"

Commission form of government is a good theory for a city if the commissioners are honest and capable men. The councilmanic form is satisfactory also if the councilmen measure up to the proper standard. That's about all there is to a much-discussed question.

There is a disposition on part of certain Oregon newspapers and politicians to make any kind of disposition of those Oregon & California railroad lands just so the action is not in accordance with Former Governor West's views on the subject.

The contention that there was no mob violence to influence the jury in the Frank trial is sustained by the general spirit with which the news of the commutation of his sentence was received, observes the Philadelphia North American.

Bryan asserts that he represents the true views of the people regarding the European war and that the newspapers are all biased one way or the other. We presume the moral is, read the "Commoner" in order to get the true dope.

General Greene cleared South Carolina of the British in the revolutionary war by his masterly retreat, and even Washington frequently back-tracked to good advantage. Possibly the Russians have been reading American history.

And only as far away as Jackson county they need rain!
