Ambitious Young Men Bilked by Fake Schools Turning Out Detectives

Secretary of State Elliott has received numerous requests for state licenses from young men who have completed a course in a correspondence school which graduates them as a finished detective. The state has no license bureau for detectives which are almost always hired by the cities or towns where they are employed and most cities prefer to train their own detectives whose usefulness depends more upon a thorough knowledge of the city and a wide acquaintance with the faces of criminals than it does upon any set of rules for catching law violators.

It appears that these detective schools advertise in cheap publications that they can turn out a full fledged detective for the small sum of a few dollars and that a high salary awaits the "graduate." The amateur detective usually gains a lot of valuable experience and insight in human nature when he endeavors to get a job and is usually content to go back to a steady job driving a dray or clerking in a store.
