nation into war. The honor of the nation should not hang on one's recklessness or stupidity.

"American blood is too precious to be shed on the altar of selfishness or commercialism. It is not too much to ask our citizens to keep off armed ships. We denounce the man who will not offer the country his life in time of war, but this denunciation is not too severe for the man who refuses to forego his personal profit or pleasure on behalf of his country."

Jones contended that the senate had been gagged and that a vote on the merits of the resolution had been prevented, and he predicted that the issue would come up again.

Senator Clarke declared: "If President Wilson is wrong he ought to be stopped. We are not going around with a chip on our shoulder nor are we going to war because of an academic question upon which even college professors are not agreed."

"We have reached no conclusion," said Senator Gallinger. "I should have voted for the rights of Americans to travel on an armed ship but I wouldn't do so under a gag rule."

He favored firmness in dealing with international problems.

"I have had been firm in our Mexican policy instead of weak and almost apologetic," he said, "nearly 200 Americans would not now be murdered in Mexico."

"President Wilson in his letter to Representative Don urged public discussion so that he might know the sentiments of congress. What does he know now? I believe in publicity, not in shoving a resolution through the senate like jamming a plank through a national convention."

"The means we used," interrupted Senator Lewis, "were necessary to execute the international policy which Senator Gallinger defends."

Senator Bush termed the senate action a "degradation" while Sherman called it "cowardice and evasion."

Many senators intimated that the vote is not final, and it seemed certain that if a break with Germany threatened, senators would renew their fight for congressional action.

President Wilson received the news of the senate vote while attending a session with his cabinet. Both he and other officials were gratified.

The White House declared the vote was entirely satisfactory.

But Senators admitted it was doubtful whether the senate had actually announced itself as against war or had committed itself to anything the president did.

Commenting on the situation, Senator Gore declared:

"I do not know what senators think who voted down my resolution. My object in introducing a substitute was to prevent a wrong construction being given to the tabling of the original. Everybody proposed to interpret tabling of the original as a declaration that congress should not interfere in diplomatic negotiations which might lead to war. This interpretation would have been incorrect."

"The original resolution made an offer for peace. When a wrong construction was to be given to tabling it offered the substitute. In that, I proposed that congress should declare itself, clearly and unequivocally as to whether there should be war with Germany if a submarine kills an American citizen on an armed ship."

Before the Battle.
Washington, March 2.—Efforts were made to keep America out of war, to which it has been nearer for the last few days than at any time since the days of President McKinley. They came to a climax at 11 a. m., when the senate met to notify the world—especially Germany that congress and the nation back President Wilson.

Action without talk was the program senate leaders decided upon in a final conference before the opening of today's session. Senator Stone was to move to table the Gore measure, and there was to be no resolution endorsing the president. Objection from anyone might prevent Gore from speaking to the motion, but there was some sentiment that he ought to speak.

Not in years had such a crowd clamored for admission to the galleries as gathered today. Catching the tenacity of the situation, senators came early and talked busily in the lobbies and in knots around the floor. Bits of paper, torn by nervous legislators—a sure sign that something big was doing—littered the floor early in the session.

count indicated that when the vote is taken after the promised brief debate, the necessary number will toe the mark. President Wilson has drawn.

Nearly three to one against the Gore warning resolution seemed the probable results, thus giving Wilson his desired support. The house may vote tomorrow. Its records will likely be in favor of Wilson's stand, but probably by a smaller ratio than in the senate.

No Partisan Lines Drawn.
The senate planned to vote on the question of tabling Gore's measure. Sufficient votes to have it tabled would have meant that President Wilson had been upheld in his position against any warning of Americans not to travel on armed ships.

It was uncertain whether there would be a vote, too, on the Jones resolution asking that the president notify congress before taking any steps that might lead to war. Administration authorities were willing for its defeat was as certain as the death of the Gore resolution.

As the senate convened, the cabinet went into session, but it planned no steps in the diplomatic situation until the congressional problems had been settled. Meanwhile the German situation remains in statu quo.

The stand of congress was along broad, patriotic, non-partisan lines. Partisanship was dwarfed in the grave concern for possible war. The vote of the senate was not upon the merits of the warning, but was really to show the belittling attitude whether congress retaliated or sustained President Wilson's stand in insisting upon no abridgement of American rights upon the seas.

Leaders said that the house would endorse the president by defeating a warning resolution, and the house foreign committee expected to take final action this afternoon on reporting out such a resolution in order that it might come to a vote.

How They Voted.
The eyes on the vote to table were Ashurst, Bankhead, Beckham, Brandegee, Broussard, Burleigh, Chilton, Clark, Clarke, Colt, Culberson, Curtis, Dillingham, Dugout, Fletcher, Gore, Harding, Harwick, Hitchcock, Hollis, Hughes, Hastings, James, Johnson (Maine), Johnson (South Dakota), Kern, Lane, Lee, Lewis, Lodge, McLean, Martin, Martine, Myers, Nelson, Newlands, Oliver, Overman, Owen, Page, Phelan, Pittman, Poindexter, Pomeroy, Ransdell, Reed, Shafer, Sheppard, Shields, Simmons, Smith (Arizona), Smith (Georgia), Smith (Michigan), Smith (Maryland), Smith (South Carolina), Sterling, Stone, Swanson, Thomas, Thompson, Tillman, Underwood, Vandamm, Vandewort, Walsh, Warren, Weeks, Williams.

The ayes were:
Borah, Chamberlain, Clark, Cummings, Fall, Gallinger, Grimes, Jones, La Follette, McClary, Norris, O'Gorman, Sherman, Works.

Women constituted a majority of those in the gallery at today's session. A buzz of conversation arose until proceedings started. Patches of color in hats and waists brightened the chamber. Outside the women's gallery, lounging indifferently, a group of Oregan Indians awaited completion of the international proceedings so that they might know of the fate of their all land less case.

In the public galleries "rail birds" almost rubbed elbows with spectators in the adjoining sections.
