May Use Volcanic Ash for Building Roads

The use of volcanic cinders for road purposes has been under consideration by the state highway commission in connection with work in Crook county this year.
Tests on samples of this material have been made at the Corvallis laboratory by Professor S. H. Graf. A report received from him today by State Engineer Lewis shows that the cinders possess but slight cementing power of themselves, and therefore their use in an ordinary type of water-bound macadam is not practicable.
The cinders also are so porous and brittle that they do not possess the necessary crushing strength to allow their use in cement or bituminous concrete roads.
The report indicates, however, that a successful road may probably be built by using the cinders as a foundation, on top of which might be put a binder course consisting of natural sanders mixed with asphalt, the wearing surface consisting of fine crushed cinders mixed in the proportions of the ordinary sheet asphalt. The latter seems feasible because the material of which the cinders are composed is in itself quite hard and resists abrasion well, but on account of its porous nature is weak mechanically, unless crushed so fine that the pores are eliminated from the individual particles.
In addition to this type of construction, some special forms of penetration method, road ways may also be investigated.

Please Don't Let My Baby Be Born in Prison

San Francisco, April 5.—Please don't let my baby be born in prison. This is the cry today of Mrs. Sherburne, aged 18, arrested on a charge of burglary. According to the story she told police, the girl married Charles A. Sherman, thirty-eight, west Avila way, at Fort Scott, last June. Last she said, "he had to spend all his money, at the Fort for guns and things." So she was evicted from her home after another, until at last, gold and hawky, she climbed through the window of Mrs. Hattie Corrie's home and took a gold watch which she needed for food.
