snans frequently blow themselves up with their captors. "Our prisoners were both guards and Saxons. "There were several counter attacks after we'd gotten in the trench—mostly down the trench, which was perpendicular, but we bombed them out so that when the red cross flag went up and down old Canada held Regina fast. Fritz' flag appeared first, but we immediately followed, taking the wounded up from No Man's Land. A Sniper Got Him. "The snipers now respect the Red Cross flag pretty well. The Germans wouldn't at first. A shell occasionally does mischief, but this is unavoidable. "Well, about this time, a sniper got me. I was stunned for several minutes. Then came the shrapnel. It caught me in the shoulder—and here I am. I remarked that his furrowed helmet would certainly be an heirloom. The sergeant remarked he had a still better one—and he fumbled in his pockets. In the miscellany he drew out there were a number of objects, including a stick of a certain well known American brand of chewing gum. He fished out and examined a watch, bent double by a bullet and remarked with a twinkle in his eyes: "I'm Irish. Some luck!" The last I saw of the sergeant was when he was in an officers' motor—one of the officers having given up his seat to stand on the running board so that the non-com could ride in a seat.

Canadian Sergeant Tells of Storming Regina French

By William Phillip Simms. (United Press staff correspondent.) (Copyright 1916 by the United Press.) Copyrighted at the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, Canada.) With the Canadian Forces on the Somme, Nov. 20.—This is the story of the storming of Regina trench—as told by a sergeant in a Canadian infantry regiment who was one of the stormers. With a slight scalp wound from a sniper's bullet, which had torn a bug hole in the steel helmet which he was still wearing, and another wound in his shoulder from a shrapnel bullet, he was "evacuating" himself to a dressing station when I encountered him. It was on the morning after the Canadians had ousted the Germans from their stretch of trench. Mud from the toes of his hip boots to his very eyes, and with a streak of blood on one side of his face, the sergeant nevertheless made light of his wounds. He smiled as he responded to questions. "Twas a good, fair scrap and the best man won," he explained, speaking with a typical Irish-American accent interlarded with American slang. "We got the tip Friday night that something would be doing about midnight. Everybody was tickled because we'd been hankering to get at that Regina trench for the past two weeks. Barrage Fire Effective. "Our artillery hit it up hotter and hotter and we could see by the brilliant moonlight that it was doing big damage to Fritz in the trenches a few hundred yards in front of us. At midnight our artillery formed a barrage fire 50 yards in front of us—and our first wave went over the parapet of our trenches like a machine. "Not a son bobbed. My hardest job was keeping my men from advancing too fast and getting under our own shell fire. Also it was pretty hard to keep the waves of men straight on account of the craters and shell holes of various depths of mud. "But when we got within 50 yards of Regina trench we formed a pretty straight line. About this time the Germans started their barrage fire, too—but they did little damage, the fire mostly going over our heads. As soon as our barrage lifted off Regina to a point 50 yards back, we stormed through. "The bosches serapped pretty well. It seemed strange that anybody could have been left alive after all the shelling they'd had, but they bobbed out of dugouts like rabbits and we had to use our bayonets. "Was Over Quickly. "We cleaned out our trenches in a very few seconds, taking prisoners. Three in one section were inclined to be troublesome. We told 'em they'd better attend to their knitting and be quiet or else we'd be obliged to finish 'em. Two behaved. But one kept jumping about in the shadows thrown by the full moon, evidently looking for something. We repeated our order to stop. He didn't obey. Well—only two prisoners instead of three were taken in that corner of the trench, for we remembered a fortnight ago a German officer, who after surrendering suddenly threw a hand grenade on our own officers, blowing the face off one and inflicting wounds of which he died.
