Just think of it. A Wells Fargo employe who spoke last evening at the open meeting before the committee that has charge of the "bone dry" law, stated that during December there was every day en route to different parts of Oregon about $1,500 worth of booze that that the business would assume the same proportions during the month of January while the scare was on as to whether Oregon was to be absolutely dry or not. He figured the December business of booze into the state, by the express company alone was close to $50,000 and that January would run it a close second. He favored a five or 10 day leeway as to when the state would be bone dry in order that his company might not have any of the goods on hand. As a common carrier, it is obliged to accept shipments, he said.

Written Reports Presented On New Salem Bridge

At the meeting last Thursday in Salem before the county courts of Polk and Marion counties, the state highway commission presented written reports on the side of the bridge and the courts are now in possession of a report covering the types of the bridges recommended.

A high level deck truss steel bridge over the Willamette river at Center street, estimated to cost $149,000 was recommended. However, a concrete arch type at the same site is feasible. But with a concrete bridge the commission suggested that there must be taken into consideration that the foundations will be on piles, that the spans are fairly long and numerous, increasing the chances of unequal settlement.

Bridges of the concrete type have been built on piles, but few of them are of such long spans in combination with the number of arches on this character of bottom in an open river current.

The highway department could not see enough advantage in a concrete type of bridge over the steel type to warrant the risk incurred of settlement, nor in paying the $10,000 extra expense of the concrete bridge. Also, within a reasonable length of time, a steel bridge can be made adaptable to the possible shift in current channel towards Polk county.

In recommending a steel bridge, the highway commission did not take into consideration the factor of cost. The report favoring a steel type was prepared by Joseph Weare, in consultation with John H. Lewis, state engineer and J. W. Metzger, designing engineer for the department. Mr. Weare, the assistant engineer in charge of bridge work is responsible for the plans and estimates and for the general features of the proposition recommended.

A checker and stem heard built entirely of different colored granite blocks, by Emil Overett, of Mt. Angel, is doing duty in a barber shop at Silvertown.

The antiquarians have matched up pretty nearly everything in their collections except a bone dry law.
