Packing and Storing Fruits After Drying

By George Martin (United Press staff correspondent) The live stock market is showing signs of weakness in several lines. Veal is now quoted at from 9 to 13 ceats, spring lambs at 9 cents and ewes at from 4 to 5 ceats.

On the basis of the present market, hard wheat flour should sell for $3.10 to $3.25 and valley wheat flour from $2.90 to $3.05.

The retail price varies according to the foresight in the buying of the various retail dealers.

(United Press staff correspondent)
Washington, Aug. 8.—Now we come to the packing and storing of the price packing and storing and storing and storing and vegetables you have dried. Although not necessary, tin cans or glass jars make good receptacles for storing dried products.

Pasteboard boxes with tight covers storing and storing and storing of the packing and storing of the packing and storing and storing of the packing and storing of the packing and storing and storing of the packing and storing and storing of the packing and storing and storin

The products must be protected from the outside moisture and will keep best in a cool, dry, well ventilated place. In humid regions air tight containers should be used.

should be used.

If you pack just enough for a meal in each container, it will not be necessary to open a container the contents of which cannot be consumed in a short or which cannot be consumed in a snort time.

If a paper bag is used the upper part should be twisted into a neck, bent over and tied tightly with twine. You might also paint it with a brush dipped in melted parrafin. You might take an added precaution by putting the bags in a tin containe, with a tight fitting, cover, such as a lard can or pail. Label all bags to show what they contain. If fruits or vegetables are packed in tight containers immediately upon being thoroughly dried they will remain just as brittle as when taken from the drier. If not dried thoroughly they will soon mold. To prevent this the material should be examined within 24 hours after packing and if it appears moist it must be dried further.
