Parson and Man in Trenches are Drawn Together by Danger and Hardship at Front

Professor of Theology Walks Eight Miles with a Sixty Pound Pack of Supplies on His Back So His 'Boys' May Have Tobacco, Sweets and Magazines.

BY CARL HOLLIDAY TO a native Yankee who can still remember old times the word "religion" can hardly fail to suggest the more or less willing habit of listening to two long sermons every Sunday and of saying your prayers before you get into bed. There may be some clergymen remaining in America who still consider these two habits as absolute essentials of godliness, but to the American preachers now in the war-zone, religion has come to mean something vastly different and greater.

of Jesus duplicated ten thousand times by common, wayward mortals on the battlefields of France; they have regained what the American preacher was in danger of losing—belief in the innate nobility of the average man. In those very acts against which many a person in his home pulpit shot his lightning oratory, he now gladly participates. He is becoming what every parson should be—most engagingly human. One Sunday not long ago a Y. M. C. A. secretary met a Methodist preacher, also a secretary, going across a French field, with a baseball bat under one arm, a large bundle of cigarettes under the other, and a Bible sticking out of his pocket. The parson stopped, somewhat embarrassed.

It is not by preaching but by glorious example that the parsons in France are once more bringing religion into its own. A congregational minister in a Y. M. C. A. but near the front line expressed it well when he said, "I have been preaching the gospel for twenty years, but during the last three months I have learned far more about it in selling chewing tobacco than during all those twenty years in the pulpit."

DENOMINATIONS FORGOTTEN. Denominationalism? It is forgotten. Recently a Y. M. C. A. secretary, one of the most prominent of New England Presbyterian preachers, walked seven miles to get a crucifix for a wounded Catholic soldier. Another secretary, pastor of one of the most fashionable Methodist churches in Massachusetts, served without discrimination Catholic, Protestant and Jew until, gassed and feverish, he was compelled by the Association manager of the district to go to a hospital. But, even in this condition he turned to with a weak smile, and declared, "This is the life for me! I wouldn't have missed it for the world!"

CONSCIENCE TROUBLED. Are these war parsons changing the conscience of the men? There is an Indian soldier who, if he could, would answer from the world beyond. That swarthy fellow had had several talks with a Y. M. C. A. secretary about drinking and had promised to quit, but suddenly temptation had overcome him, and when he awoke in the night he found himself locked in the guard-house. Struck by the thought that he had disgraced his regiment, he broke out of his prison, obtained a gun, ran to the trenches and cut over No Man's Land and the last that was seen of him in the gray dawn was his fighting a mighty battle with a mob of lusus in the enemy's trenches. Only in this way did he feel that he could square himself with God and his regiment.
