WHO'S WHO IN SALEM TOLD IN DICTIONARY OF NOTABLE PERSONS

Five Members Of Supreme Court, Congressman Hawley, Governor in List.

"Who's Who in Salem" is quite easy to answer now, since the biennial edition of "Who's Who in America" has been placed on file at the public library. This volume is a biographical dictionary of notable living men and women of the United States and contains a biography of more than 22,300. The 1918-19 edition is just out.

The author of "Who's Who in America," figures that ten men in Salem are entitled to be known to the world in general. The preface to the volume states that only those who have accomplished some educational work or have done something to make them of special import are reported in the book and that not a dollar has been paid by any whose names have been included.

The ten men in Salem regarded as entitled to be recognized as worthy of mention are Dean George H. Alden, Henry J. Bean, Henry L. Benson, George H. Burnett, Carl Gregg Doney, Lawrence T. Harris, Willis C. Hawley, Charles L. McNary, Frank A. Moore and James Withycombe.

In alphabetical order, the short biographies are as follows:

gerous part of the line. We still miss them terribly, but a very few days has shown us that there are prospective "big brothers" everywhere. We had scarcely moved into our new quarters when the most fatherly gray-haired old colonel you ever saw came in to see us. He offered us any help at his command, and comes in twice every day to see that all is going well. He is almost too fatherly in the way he hovers over us, for he puts restrictions on where we can go. But they are for our good, and we appreciate his interest. A sergeant soon turned up with a wife at home and a faculty for do-sework, and "big brothers" are growing in numbers. Americans are pretty generally of the "big brother" type, we have found.

HINDENBURG FACING DANGER OF HAVING HIS LINES PIERCED

Foch's System Of Widely Separated Attacks May Find Some Weak Spots.

By J. W. T. Mason
(United Press war expert)
New York, Aug. 23.—There are indications that the Germans do not now intend to halt their retreat permanently along the Hindenburg line, but are planning to move still farther eastward for the purpose of shortening their front and securing additional men for their new reserve armies.

Marshal Foch's continual hammering is easily interfering with von Hindenburg's pre-arranged retirement. Von Hindenburg must send back his slow-moving, heavy artillery before the infantry begins to retreat, and yet, by doing so he robs his infantry of adequate artillery protection against the allies' attacks. This is one of the reasons for the extremely small losses being suffered by the allies.

In reality von Hindenburg is now fighting a gigantic rear guard action. His retirement is no other way for Germany to concentrate her main power behind the Rhine for America's forthcoming offensive.

But the paradox exists that by attacking the Germans through incessant local drives, Marshal Foch is actually retarding the maximum speed of retirement of which von Hindenburg is capable.

This action by Marshal Foch, makes von Hindenburg's retreat a far more perilous enterprise than it would have been otherwise. Not only are extensive stores of munitions and large numbers of prisoners falling into the allies' hands, but also the possibility is always present that during the German retirement Marshal Foch may be able at some point to break through the German lines.

The danger of a break-through is now occupying the major attention of the German general staff. It accounts largely for the slow, faltering steps to the rear, and for the dogged, back-to-the-wall fighting now characteristic of the German retirement. Von Hindenburg is certainly losing more men by these operations than the allies, but he cannot help himself. The war has seen many kinds of retirements. None, however, has been like the one now engaging von Hindenburg's attention.

By means of it he is unquestionably working out new tactics of retreat to be brought into play when the time comes to defend German territory against the victorious Americans.

Extracts From Diary Kept By Late Czar

Rotterdam, Aug. 24.—German newspapers publish additional extracts from the czar's diary written immediately after his abdication.

Under date of March 3, 1917, the former ruler of Russia, wrote:

"Slept long and well. Awakened far from Divinsk. It is a sunny, frosty day. Dismissed with my people yesterday's events and read much of Julius Caesar. At 8 o'clock arrived Mogouff, where the entire staff awaited me at the station. Alexieff came with the latest news from Rodzianko. So Michael has resigned. His manifesto closed with a wag of the tail for the constituent assembly, which is to be elected within three months."

"To avoid violence one must adapt one's self."
(March 17. Slept well until 10 o'clock. Alexander (one of the grand dukes) arrived for a conference at noon. I went to the station to receive mamma and the dowager from Kieff. Took her to breakfast. Finally received two telegrams from Alice (the former czarina). The weather is horrible. A cold snow storm is raging.

"After tea received Alexieff and Fedor cuffs (the former Russian chief of staff and chamberlain of the court, respectively). Dined with mamma and so with her."

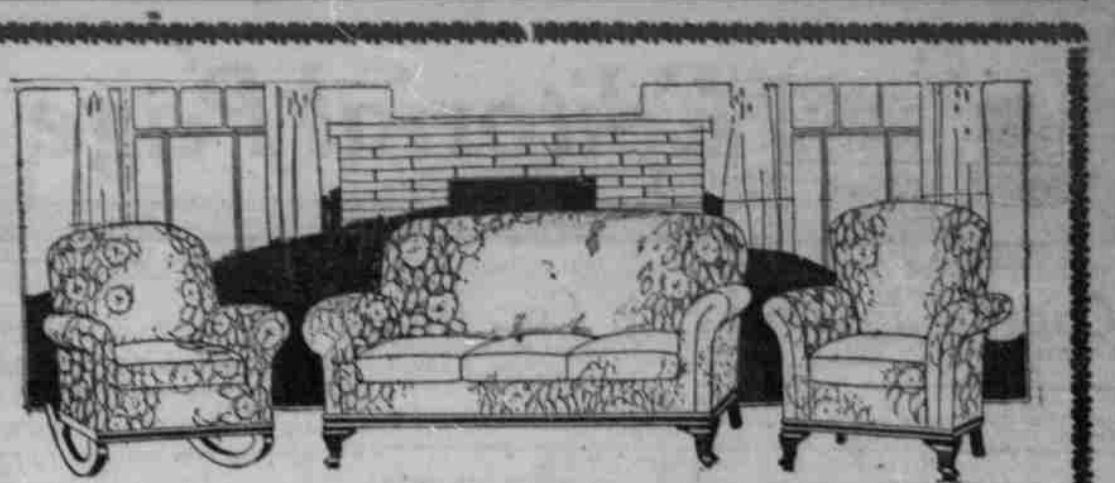

"Eleven p. m. March 18. From 10 o'clock to noon, mamma, then mamma came and we breakfasted. After tea received General Ivanoff (commander in chief on the Galician front) who came from Tsarke-Selo, where he saw Alice."

Hart's New Photoplay Coming To Oregon

There is little doubt that the popular verdict on William S. Hart's splendid new photoplay, "Shark Monroe," which is to be displayed at the Oregon theatre next Sunday, Monday and Tuesday will acclaim it one of the finest pictures in which he has as yet been seen. In this production Mr. Hart discards the chaps of the frontiersman and is seen as a typical skipper of a sealing schooner on the Alaskan coast.

Monroe is a savage man whose reputation for cruelty extends far and wide. He needs a beautiful young woman in strange circumstances one night and takes her dissipated brother to Alaska. He learns to love her with passionate fervor and when she goes to Balmam City and falls into the hands of a notorious trafficker in women Monroe follows and saves her in one of the most impressive situations ever disclosed in any motion picture.

It wouldn't be amiss for our young soldier boys to get all the tips they can from our old soldier boys concerning hand to hand fighting. The civil war was full of prodigies in that line.
