ADVOCATE ABOLITION OF MILITARY TRAINING

Ebert Says German Peace Delegation Will Vote Solidly For This Measure.

By Frank J. Taylor.

(United Press Staff Correspondent.)

Berlin, Dec. 30.—Germany will be the first country to advocate international abolition of compulsory military service.

Chancellor Ebert declared in an interview with the United Press today.

Ebert said the German peace delegation would vote solidly for this and similar measures, providing the other nations unanimously approved it. But, the chancellor said, if France continues to keep a strong standing army, Germany will favor the adoption of the Swiss system of modified service.

Got Ready Three Times But Never Even Started

Lloyd T. Bigdon, former city alderman, now in the service, had his pack rolled and ready to start for France three different times, according to a letter received a few days ago by several of his Elk friends. But he didn't even get started as about the last time the order came to pack up the armistice was signed.

Mr. Bigdon is now at Camp Lee, Virginia, and of course doesn't know whether he will be kept in the service six weeks or six months. In moving from Camp Mills to Camp Lee, he writes that he had a 30 hour ride on the ocean in one of the big army transports, then had a night-ride of eight hours on a river boat up the James river and then a ten mile hike to Camp Lee.

Virginia is that section is about 60 years behind times, he writes. There is a strict blue Sunday law and in Richmond and the big towns no picture shows are open and stores are not permitted to sell even a cigar on Sunday. He writes that Oregon looks pretty good to him, compared to Virginia.

By just one year and one month W. T. Bigdon missed being born in Oregon. That is, he was just past one year old when he arrived here with his parents from Iowa and that was away back in the spring of 1850. With the oldest pioneers, he can say that he traveled over the plains in an ox cart nine years before Oregon was admitted as a state into the Union.

In those early days, driving a three ox team to Salem was his usual work as there was no recreation and when he got to town it was his business as a boy to go around to the hotels and saw mills selling what they had raised on the farm two miles east of the present location of Woodburn.

One of the usual sights in Salem in the early days was the high board fence around the state house grounds, then known as Willson avenue, extending from the state house to the post office grounds. The cows ran at large in those days in Salem and fences were one of the household necessities.

When the effort was made to secure the ground for the post office, it was necessary to buy off all the Willson heirs, as the land had originally been given for public uses only. After all the Willson heirs had signed a quit claim deed, the post office block was sold to the government and the money received partly given to the heirs.

In the original deal between the Rev. Willson and the Oregon Methodist missionaries, it was agreed that Mr. Willson and wife should take up the 640 acres on which Salem is mostly located and that after his four years occupation and patent issued it should all be returned to the Methodists, allowing Mr. Willson and wife a certain percentage for sale of lots.

As was customary in those days, in issuing patent for the 640 acres, Mrs. Chloe Willson was given title to the north half, which happened to be north of State street and Mr. Willson the south half. There has been no controversy as to title of the land south of State street, but as Mrs. Willson had not signed the original agreement with the Methodists, to return the land after patent had been issued, it seems she did not feel disposed to carry out the agreement signed by her husband.

Hence for years there was a cloud on the title of land north of State street which was originally in the title of Mrs. Chloe Willson and in the early '70's there was law suits over the title of land occupied by the court house. Judge Boise, father of Reuben Boise, was attorney for the county in the suit brought to quiet title of the court house square and the county won the suit.
