History Of Oregon From Pen Of Professor Horner

John B. Horner, A. M. Litt. D., head of the department of historical research at the Oregon Agricultural college, has compiled a brief and efficient history of Oregon and placed it upon the market for public use.

The first epoch begins with the attempt of Columbus to discover a passage through Panama to India and ends with the completion of the Lewis and Clark expedition to Astoria. The second epoch covers a period of 38 years and deals with the settlement of the Oregon country. The third records the development of the state under the provisional government; the fourth its progress under the territorial government and the fifth its career as a state.

reliable sources from which it was compiled make it a useful and authoritative volume.

Brief accounts of the Indian wars, the early missions, the erection of the first educational buildings and public institutions, combined with the strange and beautiful legends of the settler period and the beautiful works of some of the latter day Oregon poets add greatly to its excellence.

Aside from its literary merit, however, its value as a history is great. As the author states in his introduction, "patriotism is increased by knowledge of the state" and one with a glorious history as has Oregon, should pride herself on touching it in the public schools. Mr. Horner is to be complimented on his remarkable work, and thanked for giving to the people of Oregon so complete and authentic a history of their native state.

LATE BULLETINS.

Duquoin, Ill.—This village claims a new record Eleven pounds each was the net weight credited to the new twin daughters of Mr. and Mrs. John Lewis.

Pratt, Kan.—"There is great need for baby clothes in Pratt," reads a Woman's club advertisement here.

Milwaukee, Wis.—Killing the kaiser cost Anton Kopke $1. Kaiser was a neighbor's cat and the court assessed blood money.

Detroit, Mich.—Steven Haines didn't realize how many "short, loving blondes not over 23" were available until he advertised for a wife of that description. They're still coming.

New York—"A long strap for a short man" is the slogan adopted by a newly formed organization to force the Brooklyn Rapid Transit company to install longer straps in their street-cars.

Concord, N. H.—Death valley has nothing on New Hampshire. The state legislature passed a bill forbidding the sale or consumption of Jamaica ginger or elder.
